

After the lesson I realized there are so many terms and technicalities when it comes to typography and these of course need to be taken into consideration as it affects the whole aura of the design. It was interesting to find out the different parts of a font-style or font-family which is basically part of the design/style of the typography, knowing these will help us if we would want to create our own font-style or at least determine which one to use possibly without even seeing it. The grids are almost a new thing to me as when I've created webpages before I never thought of creating a grid for a page when I'm laying out the webpage contents, I've usually used gridding when making other media like posters and logos, but when it comes to designing my webpages I usually just keep adding whitespaces in between different contents instead of creating a formal layout for it.

Colors are also one of my weaknesses when it comes to designing because I find it hard to create a unique palette as I've only created one which I've already used twice, I've also used the white text on black background a lot of times because I thought of it being aesthetically pleasing. Although this is still true, it is said during the lesson that this can mean tired and I have interpreted it as making the user feel tired because this is what the dark mode does in social media platforms apart from keeping our eyes from straining. Having known this information, I will use this contrast strategy when it is important for my project to have a feature that it should be easy to the eyes.
